Teaching Experience

Corporate Power, Elites, and the Super-Rich September 2022 – present
ECON 499CD: Undergraduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

How do powerful groups get what they want? This two-semester, eight-credit Honors Thesis seminar examines the theory and empirical research behind the study of corporate power, the role of elites in society, and the super-rich in global context. The seminar examines how these powerful groups can shape economic policies through corporate lobbying campaigns, business associations and other interest groups, and the influence of national and global elite networks. The class will combine readings and methods from economics and other social sciences to investigate these themes, with a particular emphasis on the research challenges and opportunities associated with these topics. Students will also learn a variety of practical research methods that they can deploy in their own research, such as focused comparative methods, process tracing, experimental research designs, and network analysis. Students will write a thesis relating to the key themes of the class.

Money, Power and Elites September 2022 – present
ECON 797MT: Graduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

This class centers on the political economy of financial power and the study of elites. This is a graduate level class that emphasizes group-based learning in addition to the development of independent inquiry. The course aims to generate foundational knowledge within the study of a few different areas within political economy scholarship: the political economy of financial regulation, interest group mobilization, business conflict, elite networks, the relationship between money and the state, the creation of central banks, the role of money as an instrument in political lobbying, the discipline of international finance on policymaking, the governance of international and transnational institutions that shape the world of money, and the deepening role that money plays in affecting contemporary political culture.

The International Economy August 2020 – May 2021
ECON 121: Undergraduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

This class provides an introduction to the operation of the international economic system. It emphasizes both contemporary dynamics of global economic functioning as well as the historical development of the global economic system as it has unfolded over time, and in particular in the last 300 years. Students become familiar with concepts from international economics as well as the various institutions that enable and govern international economic activity. The class covers variety of important concepts in open-economy international macroeconomics, such as comparative advantage, protectionism, exchange rate regimes, intellectual property rights, industrialization, international taxation, financial crises, banking and capital market regulation. The class is not a thorough primer on these concepts but rather engages with them in context using contemporary and historical examples of how economic processes have functioned, broken down, or simply just changed over time. A particular focus of the class is on the institutions that enable and govern economic activity – meaning institutions of law and property rights, national governmental policies, and the international organizations that govern the global economic processes.

Foundations of International Political Economy

August 2020 – present

ECON 397FP: Undergraduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

This class provides a thorough foundation to concepts and research in the field of international political economy (IPE): the study of the dynamic interplay between international economics and politics. The course first reviews different theoretical approaches to analyzing and explaining governance in the contemporary international system and the basis for world order. IPE is a fundamentally interdisciplinary field and thus a key part of this part of the course is the intellectual history of the discipline, as it emerged to tackle big global problems by borrowing concepts from other disciplines. It then covers a wide variety of contemporary issue areas in IPE, including the politics of international trade, global inequality, how global governance institutions are contested, and international financial regulation.

Power, Privilege and Inequality on a Global Scale

January 2018 –May 2018

POLSCI 290: Undergraduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

Designed and taught undergraduate class focusing on the causes and consequences of global inequality, historical imperialism, and elite social stratification. The class is broken down into three sections. The first section, entitled ‘The State of the World’ deals with the empirical evidence on the distribution of global income and wealth. The second section, ‘The Major Forces that Shaped The World’ reviews a number of major historical forces such as the origin of the modern state, territorial empires, and the origin of capitalism. The third and final section of the class, ‘How Governance Operates’ explores some of the concepts related to how social hierarchy is maintained, with a particular emphasis on elites and elite power.

Political Inquiry

September 2016 –December 2018

POLSCI 792: Graduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

This course provides an introduction to the logic of inquiry and research design in political science. This course centers on philosophy of science issues appropriate for the graduate training of social scientists and introduces graduate students to the wide range of approaches used by political scientists to study the world. This is a graduate level course that emphasizes group-based learning in addition to the development of guided but ultimately independent investigation. The course aims to generate foundational knowledge on perspectives and debates within the philosophy of science. Students sharpen their critical thinking about how knowledge about politics is pursued and developed, and develop their analytical reasoning, research and presentational skills associated with graduate-level training. Students become familiar with the diversity of approaches to the study of politics in terms of research design in particular.

Money and Power

September 2014 –present

POLSCI Graduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

Designed and taught graduate level class on the role of money in contemporary society. The class first covers foundational theories of money and the creation of monetary institutions and then explores a variety of contemporary research topics in the field, such as governance of the International Monetary Fund, advocacy over US financial regulation, the creation of the US Federal Reserve, and the ‘financialization’ of contemporary politics.

Political Economy

September 2013 –December 2013

Graduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

Designed and taught (with Regine Spector) graduate level class on foundations of political economy. The class first covers major 19th and 20th Century foundational thinkers. It then explores a variety of contemporary topics in political economy research, from the role of institutions in economic development, to national varieties of capitalism and the role of international markets in shaping contemporary policy.

Corporate Lobbying in the Global Economy

September 2012 –present

POLSCI 388: Undergraduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

Designed and taught undergraduate class focusing on theories and empirical studies of the role of organized business in global public policies. Students engage with different theories of business power including instrumental lobbying, structural power approaches, and the role of intra-business conflict. The class then examines business power in a variety of issue areas, such as pharmaceuticals regulation and intellectual property rights, macroeconomic policies of international organizations, global financial regulation, and extractive industries.

International Political Economy

September 2012 –present

POLSCI 359: Undergraduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

Designed and taught this lecture style class, which fulfills the Integrative Experience (IE) requirement for UMass Undergraduates. The class provides a thorough introduction to the field of international political economy (IPE) and is oriented around the question ‘how is the global economy governed?’. Topics include the politics of international trade, the role and influence of the International Monetary Fund, the politics of international trade, how global standards operate, who is in control of global banking regulation, and how global governance institutions are contested by non-state actors.

International Political Economy of Money and Finance

September 2012 –December 2012

Graduate-level class, University of Massachusetts Amherst

Designed and taught this graduate-level seminar class. The class examined a range of literature on the international political economy (IPE) of financial markets in contemporary society. Students are introduced to the literature examining and debating the role of global financial markets in contemporary politics, research exploring the relationship between finance and war, the politics of banking regulation and the ‘financialization’ of the economy.

Other Related Professional Experience

Deputy Editor

November 2005 – July 2007

Millennium: Journal of International Studies

I held responsibility of securing peer review reports from international relations scholars around the world, in order to facilitate manuscript review, leading to the production of Vol. 34(2) - Vol. 36(1) of the journal

Steering Committee Member

June 2017 –

Progressive Economics Forum (PEF)

The PEF organizes a large component of the conference venues at the Canadian Economics Association (CEA) annual meeting, organizes summer schools and events for students and the public, and serves as a networking platform for economists across Canada. I have taken on multiple roles within the PEF over the years, such as for example serving as the lead panels organizer at the CEA annual meetings and serving as a panel judge on Essay contests and the annual JK Galbraith prize. Since 2019 I have been the Coordinator for the national student essay contest that the PEF runs on an annual basis for both undergraduate and graduate students across the country.

Associate Director

September 2018–August 2019

Institute for Social Science Research (ISSR)

The ISSR is a methods and methodology institute at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. I served as the Associate Director under the leadership of the Director, Laurel Smith-Doerr, for a 1-year term. Responsibilities included organizing the ISSR's internal operations, methodology workshops and speaker series.

Editor

October 2022 –

Review of International Political Economy (RIPE)

I am part of the Editorial Board of RIPE, serving a 3-year term. This position involves regular (daily) review of manuscripts and reviewer reports in all stages, deliberation and coordination within the Editorial Board and promoting the journal in professional venues.

Executive Council Member

September 2022 –

Society for the Advancement of Socio-Economics (SASE)

I was elected to the SASE Executive Council in July 2022, for a 3-year term. This position involves executive decision-making for the SASE's major decisions, annual conference planning, budgeting and internal organization. I am currently the Chair of the Nominations Committee, which organizes the elected slate of all Executive Council members within the organization.

Methodology Council

August 2023 –

World Elites Database (WED)

The WED is a global consortium of researchers trying to standardize and share data on economic elites around the world. It currently comprises approximately 45 researchers from 14 different countries. The WED has been organized through different national teams and I have led the national team for the United States since 2022, a position that continues. I currently serve on the Methodology Council of the WED, which decides a variety of standardized criteria for how elite populations and their attributes are to be gathered and measured across the world.
