GRANT-FUNDED RESEARCH IN PROGRESS

Leidner, B., & Hirschberger, G. (in progress). How Past Collective Trauma of Suffering and Perpetrating Intergroup Violence Can Facilitate or Prevent Intergroup Violence in the Present. This grant-funded project uses a multimethod approach of self-report measures and impedance cardiography to: 1) better understand how and when collective trauma can escalate or deescalate conflict; 2) explore victims' and perpetrators' historical representations of trauma, and the resulting motivations and behavioral intentions; 3) test whether historical representations of trauma are also represented at the level of cardiovascular responses of threat and challenge; 4) examine if threat representations can be turned into challenge representations through reframing. Four field experiments and four physiological lab studies test our theory among Israeli Jews and Germans in the context of the Holocaust, and Americans and Arab Muslims in the context of the "war on terror."

Leidner, B., & Li, M.* (in progress). Understanding and Improving the Justice Discourse in Israeli-Palestinian Conflict Resolution. Drawing on and synthesizing previous literature on intergroup relations, conflict, and justice, this grant-funded project explores the following research questions in the context of the conflict between Israel and Palestine, with field experiments with both Israeli and Palestinian participants: (a) whether victims seek retributive justice and perpetrators restorative justice, which leads to a preference for violent and non-violent conflict resolution, respectively, and ultimately to willingness or unwillingness to reconcile, respectively; b) whether the type of justice victims and perpetrators seek depends on their identification with their respective groups, and their needs after their respective experiences in the conflict; (c) whether one conflict party's behavior in the conflict depends on the other party's demands for, or offers of, justice; and d) whether interventions that should encourage compatible demands for justice between both sides of a conflict can facilitate peaceful conflict resolution and reconciliation.
