TEACHING-University of Massachusetts-Amherst

School of Public Health & Health Sciences, Department of Health Promotion and Policy

Fall 2020 PUBHLTH 129: Health Care for All: Myth or Reality?

- Designed a 14-week course that introduces the organization and financing of the US medical care delivery system and how it affects historically marginalized populations in the United States
- The course also examines health care through a human rights framework by comparing population health outcomes between privatized healthcare systems and publicly-financed health care systems in other countries.
- Fulfills General Education and Diversity Undergraduate Requirements
- Moved large lecture to remote online platform

Spring 2019/2020 HPP 590B: The Social and Political Economy of Health Inequalities

- Designed and instructed a 14-week undergraduate and graduate course that focuses on how economic, political and social policies produce health inequalities.
- Students analyze domestic and international policies through theories of political economy and how they have produced inequities among racial/ethnic, class, gender, and sexual minorities.
- Students learn about primary prevention strategies and structural interventions.

Fall 2018/Fall 2019 PUBHLTH 490G: Race, Public Health & Policy

- Designed and instructed a 14-week undergraduate course that explores the historical and contemporary approaches to the issues of race/ethnicity in biomedicine and public health health.
- Students analyze domestic and international economic development and scientific policies with critical, social theories to understand how biomedicine and public health can be used as instruments of social control that perpetuate racist approaches to the body and health.
- Students develop a critical to approach to include race and ethnicity in biomedical and public health research that is meaningful and not exploitative.
